Hiatus in Segistro, but probably Thomas Burroughs, instituted to the Rectory of Beaumont, 19 Dec., 1523, and who died in 1529. For the following note on the musical instruments bequeathed by Lord Marney I am indebted to Mr. Thomas Lea Southgate, of Clapham. The Virginal was identical with the spinet; sometimes it was made triangular in shape, and at others like a square pianoforte; the sound was produced by the strings being plucked with a piece of quill fastened to a jack which rested on the opposite end of the key to that acted on by the fingers. The compass of the instrument was four octaves only, and it had but one string to each note. Unlike the modern piano in which the hammer strikes the string, thereby making expression obtainable, in the virginal as the strings were always plucked with the same force, neither for le nor piano was, of course, possible. The earliest mention of the instrument with which I am acquainted occurs in one of the proverbis inscribed on the walls of the Manor house at Leckingfield, Yorkshire, temp. Hen. VIX-The Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth containing 418 pp. of music is in the British Museum, the pieces of which are by no means easy to play even at the present day. Some think the instruments were called Virginals from having been used by the nuns in singing hymns to the B. Virgin. I think the name simply shews, that they were for young ladies or virgins to play upon. In old MSS. they are always spoken of (as by Lord...
