Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: ... transferred from Didsbury to Manchester, where there are entries relating to the Peel in Cheetham, but not to the Peel in Heaton. Mr. Owen has extracted these Cheetham Peel entries in his MSS. A vain endeavour has been made to trace or learn more about the remains found by Dr. Thomas. In collecting these notices I have been helped by Mr. John Baird, of Didsbury, and they seem to embrace all that has been printed on the subject. Excavations, as authorised by the landowner, Earl Egerton, are very desirable. The blocks of red sandstone may have faced the platform sides of the moat as seems to have been often the case, and the large-sized bricks may have been the foundations of a building if ever there was one on the platform. AN ANCIENT SCULPTURED STONE IN MANCHESTER CATHEDRAL. BY JOSEPH J. PHELPS. BEFORE attempting to describe any investigations or express any opinion as to the date of the stone which is the subject of this paper, it will be advisable to recount the facts regarding its discovery and recent history. When the ancient south porch of the Cathedral was taken down, in the spring of 1871, a curious carved stone was found built into the wall a little above the level of the ground, and in fair preservation. Mr. Crowther, in his work on The Cathedral Church of Manchester, says, p. 8: There is a strong probability that it formed part of the tympanum of an old Saxon doorway, probably the south doorway of the nave of the ancient Saxon church. Referring to the porch (on p. 9) he says: Some of the ashlar stones, worked with an axe instead of a chisel, which were found in the porch and other places, may possibly be of Norman date, but they have more the character of Saxon workmanship, and I am of opinion, from their peculiar ch...
